it for that of my friend, "you've had sunstroke today in Chicago. 'Doc' says you'll be fitter-fit in no time."

I fell into an untroubled sleep, conscious of nothing but the sound of measured footsteps following the wake of death. That sound I shall hear always.

PRESENTIMENT

From the French of Maurice Leblanc. (Translated by Mrs. William Flewellyn Saunders.)

At two o'clock in the afternoon a dray brought to the chateau a new automobile which the Count d'Aubrais had ordered—a thirty-five horsepower Ad-Astra.

The chauffeur listed it, set the engine in motion. All went well. At five o'clock the count said:

"I have a great desire to try my new car."

"Oh, no. Not today!" cried his wife earnestly.

"Why not today?"

"Ma foi—I do not know—an idea—"

The count shrugged his shoulders and turning to his daughter said:

"Where is your brother, Henriette?"

"Paul has gone down to the beach with the 'vingt-chevaux.'"

"Ah, that is true. I had forgotten. And you, Henriette, would you like to go with me?"

The countess protested immediately, "No, no! You do not need her—there is no use in going at all—absolutely none—"

The count looked at her in astonishment.

"Ah, ca mais—what is the matter with you? We go out every day, do we not? What reason is there for not going today?"

She hesitated, then said:

"No reason at all, of course—it is childish of me. Go and get ready Henriette. Shall you be gone long?"

"Oh, no! Only a short spin—as far as Fainele-Dun. At seven o'clock we shall be back—at seven exactly."

"What road will you take?"

"There is only the one through Gentilly. The other is impracticable. Rele tranquil, I shall be prudent—as always. I have not the slightest desire to break my neck."

The countess went to the door with her husband and daughter and insisted that they should provide themselves with heavy wraps, for the count always rode with the auto uncovered and there was a fresh breeze blowing across the downs. When the car had disappeared around a bend in the road, she took up a bit of embroidery and installed herself upon the terrace to wait.

At seven o'clock they had not returned. She said to herself:

"If in five minutes they are not here, it is because there has been an accident."

At the end of five minutes she allowed five minutes more before deciding that the accident was certain. These minutes also slipped away and her uneasiness changed into an inexpressible anguish.

And remorse? She should not have allowed them to go. She should not have allowed it. There are presentiments to which it is culpable not to listen. How did it happen that she had never before had a presentiment and that never before had her husband been late? Strange coincidence between these two facts which, each of them, happened today for the first time! A break down? Why just upon this particular day?

She mounted to the top of a little belvedere which overlooked the country. Upon the horizon, no one! The broad white road was deserted. But suddenly a tiny black spot appeared on the road leading from the sea, and from the speed with which it moved there was no doubt that it was an automobile! That of her son Paul, evidently.
